Changing University Student Politics in Sri Lanka: From Norm Oriented to Value Orient Student Movement

Introduction

Student politics is a significant phenomenon in University education in Sri Lanka. Involvement of student in politics has a long history and has always reflected the social and political changes in the country. Consequently the current, student councils are highly politicized bodies and the universities are strong centers of youth led agitation. In a sense it could be stated that the universities are barometers of social and political discontent.

In tracing the history of student politics until 1960, Sri Lanka did not have a single student movement. However, with the expansion in the number of universities student councils became a wing of the radical or leftist political parties. After 1971, university student politics become a part and parcel of insurrectionary violence and guerrilla warfare in Sri Lanka. The causes behind the changing students politics is closely linked to the expansion of university education and the changes in the selection of members to student bodies.

Aims and Objectives

The main objective of this paper is to examine the causes behind changing student politics in Sri Lanka. This paper is therefore divided into four major parts. This first part deals with the analytical framework of the paper. The second part deals with factors that have contributed university student politics in the country.

The third part examines the nature and type of student organizations. The fourth part examines the response of the government or the university. The final part is the observations which include recommendations.

Analytical Framework

The analytical framework is based on the analysis made by David J. Finlay's pamphlet titled “Youth and Politics: A Pre-theoretic Model” has been of special relevance to this paper. Youth are perceived of, as actors in any political system. If a political system is to persist, one of its major tasks is to provide for a minimal level of support for a regime of some kind. Yet political system generally does not conceive of students as participants in politics. Where students find themselves ignored by or participatory roles in the adult power structure, they are likely to seize the initiative in an effort to make their demands know. The result is confrontation politics between students and authority.

According to this analytical framework Finlay argues that confrontational politics arises out of four main reasons. The first is the lack of integration into adult power structures and decision making processes. The second is the degree to which a political authority is recognized as being legitimate. Confrontation politics also results when students feel that authority is not acceptable or legitimate. The legitimacy orientations of students are an expression of their evaluation of the appropriateness or inappropriateness of authority, particularly a political regime.

There are three possible legitimacy orientations: supportive, oppositional and acquiescent. When students regard authority as legitimate, they will tend to perform supportive or acquiescent roles in relation to the political system. However, when students do not grant legitimacy to the system, their behavior is oppositional and confrontational.

According to David J. Finlay, the third cause of student involvement in politics is the process of politicization. Politicization means the degree of political awareness and involvement in the world of politics and government. According to him, the level of politicization contributes to the level and type of political participation of students.

He further argues that the levels of politicization correlate with the levels of participation. There are three politicization levels as minimal, moderate, and high. A high level of politicization leads to riots and rebellion, moderate participation results in demonstrations and the formation of parties, and minimal politicization confines the orientation to voting and discussion.

In addition, there are some systemic variables influencing the political behavior of students. They are as follows:

1. The structure of the educational system;
2. The propensity of the authorities to sanction political opposition;
3. The degree of relationships between the student population and the political elite.

The structure of the education system may be elite or mass in both quantitative and qualitative terms. The legitimacy orientation of students in an elitist system tends to be supportive and the salience of oppositional activity is decreased. It does not leave space for oppositional politics due to the small student bodies, residential accommodation of quality standards, and close student supervision through low student-faculty ratios, tutorials, and geographic isolation of the campus.

The mass educational system does not give any guaranty of elite status to students. They have more time to enroll in national politics rather than in the elite system. In countries where the economic infrastructure fails to keep pace with the educational expansion, career opportunities are apt to be insufficient to meet the high expectation of graduates. Thus, the introduction of mass education may lead to student frustration and alienation. As a result, what emerges is a class of career students, unable and perhaps unwilling to leave the university, who are active dissidents in the political process.

The second variable is the ability of the political elites to employ sanctions against oppositional political activity.

The third variable is the congruity of the student and political elite. At least three factors must be considered in establishing a degree of congruity or incongruity between students and political elites.

The first is similarity or differences in social backgrounds and recruitment. The second is the existence and extent of competition among elites. The third factor is the extent of shared (or opposed) attitudes, beliefs, and values.

On the basis of the above-mentioned model, the roles of students can be presented as follows:

1. In a mass educational system with a low sanction student politicization will be acquiescent or supportive in the minimal or moderate activity ranges if elite congruity is at the moderate to high end of a continuum.
2. If however, elite-student congruity is low for significant proportions of the student population, supportive orientations will be less frequent and oppositional orientations will increase and will be directed against the regime.

3. In a mass educational system in a closed political system with a high propensity to sanction (but with the sanction function still low) if student-elite congruity is high, participation will be largely ritually supportive or acquiescent, oppositional activity will be more sporadic than sustained and will be at a high participation level when it does occur. For an example there will be fewer attempts to form political parties but demonstrations and riots will occur involving a larger number than no 2.

4. If student-political elite congruity is low, supportive orientations at any level of participation will largely disappear as students move into acquiescence and increasingly sporadic opposition. Oppositional politicization is at its height in this category with the largest number in the perceptually-related but minimally participant category. The discussion stage of oppositional politics will be at sustained levels initiated by the highly politicized participants. It is this cell of the model that provides instances of student riots that precipitate government or regime change in developing countries.

5. In an elitist educational system in an open polity if the student-political elite congruence is high, the politicization distribution will be normal and legitimacy orientations will be supportive.

6. If however, student-political elite congruence is low, legitimacy orientations will shift to ambivalence or opposition and levels of politicization will correspondingly depart from normal as the ambivalent take refuge in inactivity and opposed become more active.

7. In an elitist education system in a closed polity where the sanction function is at high levels, if students-political elite congruence is high, legitimacy orientation will be supportive and politicization levels will skew toward higher participation, particularly if a mobilization system demands overt manifestations of support.

8. If, however, elite-student congruence is low, legitimacy orientation will again move into the ambivalent or opposed categories but activity will diminish to inactivity or minimal activity. The high sanction function combined with the careerist-orientation of elitist students will severely mitigate overt opposition at any level.

Given the possible combinations of these three systemic variables, what kind of situations are conducive to student activism in politics? What conditions determine whether student activism will be directed mainly against the authority structure of society or whether it will be expressed through traditional affiliations with status quo political parties or social fraternities?

To answer these questions it is necessary to differentiate two types of student movements. The first are those students organizations which are norm-oriented, that is interested in affecting particular norms or means to attain agreed upon social values. Generally, such student movements are concerned primarily with particular issues such as student rights, university reforms, or a particular government policy. These movements tend to be transitory. Periods of intense activism on specific issues are often followed by a sharp decline in activity once that issue has declined in salience.

A second type of student movement is value-oriented, that is, concerned with ultimate ends or basic conceptions about social institutions. Value-oriented movements tend to press for more extreme and ideological programs than do norm-oriented groups.

Norm-oriented student movements tend to arise in either elitist or mass system when there is low congruity between students and elites and a low propensity to sanction by authorities. The low sanction function enhances the probabilities of successfully resolved particular issues, and with success militancy declines.

Value-oriented student movements tend to develop where congruity between students and elites is low and where a high propensity to sanction exists. The high sanction function minimizes opportunity for activism and alienates students. Thus, for those who are highly politicized, radicalism is virtually the only available alternative to acquiescence, and it is the highly politicized students who are affiliated with value-oriented movements.

Causes of Students Politics

University education in Sri Lanka began with the establishment of a University College in 1921 with 115 students. The University of Ceylon was established in 1942 with 904 students. Currently, there are 14 conventional universities, three campuses, 9 undergraduate and 7 post-graduate institutions providing education to a student population of 72,000 students in the country. The rapid expansion of free education from primary education to tertiary education has led to this rapid enrolment and completion rates in primary and secondary education and the demand for tertiary education. There are also degree awarding fee levying institutions and 72 cross border universities. The Open University which has 27 regional centers provides a broad based distance education.

The transformation of system of education from an elitist-oriented education to a mass based system over the years has contributed the change of political participation of students in Sri Lanka. According to David J. Finlay the main cause of student involvement in politics is the process of politicization. According to him the level of politicization contributes to the level and type of political participation of students. A high level of politicization leads to riots and rebellion, moderate participation results in demonstration and the formation of parties and minimal politicization confines the orientation to voting and discussion.

The expansion of university education contributed to the politicization of the student population in two respects. The first is the structural changes in university education. David J. Finlay perceives a dichotomy in the educational system between elitist and mass educational system. According to him an elite system is one in which restrictiveness of the upper-levels of the educational pyramid virtually guarantees the elite status of those in institutions of higher education.

From the inception the education structure at the University of Ceylon could be safely inferred as an elitist education with English as the sole media of instruction. It provided residential facilities and was an exclusive university with a limited student population. The structural focus was on imparting the British model of education. The curriculum, examination and teaching patterns of the university were derived from the University of London. The University of Ceylon built on the Ox-bridge model and initially established in Colombo in 1942 and moved to Peradeniya in 1952.

With the expansion of university education along with change of medium of instruction from English to Sinhala and Tamil and admission policy university education in Sri Lanka moved from Elite to mass model. The more significant feature of mass university education is the changing socio-economic composition of the student population from the period 1960 onwards. There is a marked transition from the high representation of the Urban English speaking middle class to a high representation of the rural Sinhala-Buddhist among student cadres. This trend has been a result of the standardization and district quota system introduced from 1973. Furthermore, the change of socio-economic background of the student population vividly indicates from the employment structure of the parents of the university students. According to the University Grants Commission (UGC) Statistical Handbook of 1988/89 the employment structure of the parents of the students in that academic year was weighted to the low-income category. Nearly 40 percent of the parents of the university students had a monthly income less than Rs.1000.

The expansion in the number of universities and the student population was not marked by a concomitant expansion in facilities fro extra-curricula activities, sports and infrastructural services. Furthermore, staff-student relation have not developed or deteriorated. The remaining staff-student relations in universities do not encourage meaningful academic relationship.

In spite of the structural changes in the system of education from elite to a mass, there has been no corresponding change in the aspirations of the students. The emphasis continues to be on white collar employment. This emphasis necessitates rapid economic development to meet the aspiration and expectation of university students. However, due to the slow growth of the country’s economy the opportunities for employment are fast dwindling. An additional 20,000 graduate annually enter the labour force leading to a steady expansion in the rate of employment among graduates.

Underemployment is another facet of the economic dynamics related to student unrest and their involvement with political violence organization. The level of underemployment is manifest in the type of employment opportunities offered to social science graduates. Around 8000 graduate were temporarily absorbed into the public sector in 1994 for a monthly salary of RS.2, 500 amounting to a daily wage of Rs. 113. As a result, university education has become a source of frustration rather than a means of upward mobility. The structural changes in education and the decline in white colour employment opportunities are causal factors of the politicization of university students.

Ability to impose sanctions is another facet of student discontent related to student unrest and their involvement with confrontational politics. “Raggins” within universities which has become a widespread problem within universities can be cited as an issue where authorities have failed to impose sanctions effectively. Initially, ragging began as clean fun but has now degenerated into one of the worst forms of student behavior and has increased dramatically. Consequently, the smooth functioning of law and order within universities are under threat and the authorities are not in a position to enforce discipline.

What is significant of the growth and development of the student movement is the decline of the student organizations belong to the political elites such as the United national Party (UNP) and the Sri Lanka Freedom Party (SLFP) and orthodox left-wing parties and the emergence of student organization dominated by the clandestine or semi-clandestine youth movements. This development shows changing relation between political elite and the university student in the country.

Type of Student Organization

Student movement can be distinguished as either norm-oriented or value-oriented movements. A norm-oriented movement is an attempt to restore, protect modify or create norms in the name of a generalized belief. It is concerned with a specific limited issue such as student’s rights, university reforms, or a particular government policy. A value-oriented movement refers to a student movement that is fundamentally oriented toward rendering some change in the social structure. It is characterized by a concern for broad ideological issues and is associated with revolutionary organizations.

With the change of the education system the typology and pattern of student organizations have change. Prior to 1977, there were more norm or theoretical oriented and belong to the national political parties. During this period student politics were dominated either by Lanka Jathika Shisya Sangamaya, the Student wing of the Pro Moscow Communist Party (CP) or the Lanka Shishya Sammelanaya, a student wing of the Lanka Sama Samajaya Party (LSSP). In terms of ideology, the CP was committed to the Soviet line while the LSSP followed the Trotskyite ideology. These two student organizations were subsequently challenged by the Socialist Student Union (SSU) which was the student wing of the pro Mao-Communist Party (CPP). During this period student issues were dominated by issues of student welfare.

However this situation changed from the mid 1970s and resulted in more value or action oriented student organizations. Consequently, the ideology and perception of the student movement shifted from interpretations of Marxism to varying interpretation of ethno-nationalism. The student bodies perceived themselves as a vanguard of social change. This shift in ideology led to a process of alienation where student politics separated from national politics and merged with underground organizations controlled by the militant youth.

The shift in paradigms also changed issues which were the centre of agitation. Issues were no longer confined to on-campus educational issues, but also involved secondary educational and national issues. Of these issues the following are noteworthy: the issue of the North Colombo Private Medical College, and the Indo-Sri Lanka Accord of 1987.

Student councils play a significant role in politicizing the student population in the universities. Until 1968, student councils were selected through the system of election based on halls of residence. Since 1968, the election system changed into a direct election at university level. Currently, the open election system has been done away with and student councils are selected through systematic manipulation. A significant development has been the importance attached to the batch, which has become the nucleus of student politics within the university. The general student meeting is replaced by the batch meeting. The decision taken at batch meeting is not disputed and is accepted as the general will of the students. Each batch elects two students as batch representatives per academic year. These batch leaders become leaders of the students union. The representation to the student union is also based on the batch representations. These changes in the system of union have contributed to the imposition of the unions and will of the students union on the university student population in general. This also discourages the formation of alternative students groups.

The student council with the blessing of the IUSF converts new students through the “ragging” (a system of induction for new students) and indoctrination classes and mobilize students for confrontational politics with the administrative and decision making institutions including the Vice Chancellors of the respective universities. Furthermore, it mobilizes students for national issues based on the political agenda of hidden forces. A key mobilizing factor is the issue of free education and opening up tertiary education to the private sector.

The Inter University Students Federation (IUSF) is another development in student politics in the country. The organization serves as a bridge between the student politics and underground organizations. The Inter University Student Federation (IUSF) a cat’s paw of the militant Janatha Vimukthi Peramuna (JVP) manipulates student politics for its political agenda. Currently the university student politics is controlled by the Inter University Student Federation. Although, it is not a legal entity recognized by the University Act of 1978, it functions as a de facto student federation. It serves as a bridge between student politics and insurrectionary movements in the country.

The direct impact of student politics on insurrectionary movements is witnessed in the composition of the Janatha Vimukthi Peramuna (JVP) polit-bureau before the insurrection from 1987 to 1989. Of the 13 members in the polit-bureau of the JVP 9 were university students In the Central Committee out of 49, 10 were university students. According to the University Grants Commission (UGC) 300 students are reported missing due to the insurrection from 1987-1989, and 227 were in custody while 49 are reported dead. Thereby, the legitimacy orientation of university students has changed. Consequently, the nature and scope of student politics has shifted from pro-system oriented politics to confrontational politics.

In an elite education system, the general atmosphere is not conducive for highly politicized student bodies which challenge the authority of the authorities maintained a monopoly of the university decision making process as exemplified in the University Acts of 1972 and 1978. The universities were also in a position to maintain law and order in the absence of a decisive challenged from the student body. As a result, the university is in a position to impose sanction where and when necessary, and maintain low and order without upsetting the university calendar.
However, the change in the education system from elite to mass system change in the level of politicization and the legitimacy orientation of the university student had a direct impact on the authority of the university.

The policy making authority of the ministry of Higher Education, University Grants Commission and the university has already been challenged by the Inter University Student Federation. It has developed a parallel organization to the UGC concerning student affairs.

The change of the higher education system in addition to free education fee levying or private universities is a tenacious issue that has implications on national politics. The confrontational politics spearheaded by the student unions which target decision making bodies such as the Ministry of Higher Education and the University Grants Commission has placed these institutions in a difficult situation where change management and maintaining the normal functions of the universities are of primary concern. In such an operating environment all forms of change even minor changes are difficult and it is imperative that the universities do not precipitate national crises at a time when delicate and decisive social and economic measures are being undertaken by the Government of Sri Lanka.

Government Response

Given this situation, the response of the government is important in the context of student and youth confrontational politics. Increasingly, successive governments appointed commissions and brought in legislature/act in order to align the university system according to the changes. Of these, the Educational Act of 1972 was a landmark in the development of universities and student politics in Sri Lanka. Through the act the universities merged as the “University of Sri Lanka”. This merger gave rise to the Inter University Student Federation (ISUF). This act also made provision for student Councils to nominate representatives to the senate and the faculty board, and introduced the student counseling system.

However, the University Act of 1978 once again created separate universities and left no provision for student councils to forge links forming an integrated body. Besides, the act abolished the system of nominating student representatives to the senate but allow nominate to the faculty board. In 1978 a separate minister was appointed in charge of university education. The most significant event was the abolishment of the student councils by the University Amendment Act of 1985. According to the act students councils were to be replaced by a new committee chaired by the vice chancellor (vc). These student committee were never formed and action committees(ac) emerged as a result. As a result of these acts, universities came increasingly under government control and directs.

Since 1994 governments have introduced special employment programme for graduates. They have been recruited as teachers, development officers and trainees in the graduate scheme in order to ease the problem of employment.

It is evident that the universities have become a forum for student/youth unrest. It is mainly due to due to the lack of mechanism which address student issues and grievances. Therefore, it is necessary to review the existing student counseling system. In order to overcome the student discontent, it is necessary to take steps to develop social and personal relation between the university staff and students. Besides, university authorities, students and government have to develop a type of mutual understanding among themselves through dialogue and discussions. Furthermore, it is necessary to promote the social life, leisure time activities and extramural activities of students.

Observations and Conclusion

It is obvious that politicization of university student and their deviation from the national democratic politics has become a major challenge to the policy makers of the higher education in the country. In the absence an articulate and coherent policy addressing the problem of political violence in the country, the student movement continues to be a voice of discontent and agitation. Furthermore, their alienation from the mainstream socio-economic and political system has led them to take up an agitational and confrontational stand. It is not possible to alleviate the problems of student and youth without addressing major issues in relation to the higher education in the country.
